

Barriers For Women In Computing

By K.K. Sharma

2003. Hardcover. Book Condition: New. 282 The way that computing is presented and taught in schools has a major impact on girls third level choice and can motivate them to either choose computing or reject it as a career choice. Girls interest in communication, group work and social usefulness needs to be stimulated by presenting computing as a communication tool and emphasising its social dimensions, as well as its technical possibilities, within the educational curriculum. This book aimed to identify barriers to women's participation and progression in computing and to highlight positive factors that influence women's career choice and academic success. It indicates that the problem of women's under-representation does not lie in women's lack of ability or interest, or their false perception of computing, but rather in the academic and cultural environment which is inherently, as well as stereotypically masculine. About The Author:- Mr. K.K. Sharma is an eminent historian who has rich contribution in numerous fields of historical researches. He has contributed in various seminars having deep links with the socio-economic condition of women as well as the great utility of computers. At present Shri Sharma is Asst. Superintending Archaeologist in the Archeological Survey of India. Contents:- Contents...
